Exploring the Diverse List of Careers in History

For many people, the phrase “majoring in history” conjures images of dusty archives, endlessly reading ancient texts, or teaching high school students about the rise and fall of empires. While those paths certainly exist, the reality is far more dynamic. A history degree is not a vocational ticket to a single profession; it is a foundational education in critical thinking, research, analysis, and communication. As a result, the list of careers in history is surprisingly long and varied. From the hallways of corporate law firms to the cutting rooms of documentary production, individuals with a background in the past are shaping the future. This article explores the breadth of opportunities available to history graduates, highlighting both traditional and unexpected paths. Whether you are a student considering the major, a recent graduate, or someone contemplating a career change, understanding the full spectrum of historical professions can open your eyes to possibilities you may never have considered.

Why History Majors Are Highly Valued in the Job Market

Before diving into specific roles, it is important to understand what makes a history graduate attractive to employers. The skills cultivated through historical study are some of the most transferable in any industry. History students learn to evaluate sources for bias, construct evidence-based arguments, and synthesize complex information from disparate sources. They become adept at writing clearly and persuasively, presenting findings to diverse audiences, and managing long-term projects with multiple deadlines. These competencies are precisely what modern organizations need in an era of information overload. Consequently, the list of careers in history spans sectors including education, government, law, business, media, and non-profit work. The degree does not limit you; it empowers you to adapt to many roles.

Traditional and Academic Career Paths

Many people naturally associate a history degree with becoming a historian or an educator. These remain popular and fulfilling options, though the landscape has evolved over the years. The following are some of the most established professions for history graduates in academic and research settings.

University Professor or College Instructor

Teaching at the post-secondary level remains a goal for many who pursue advanced degrees. A PhD is typically required for tenure-track positions, where professors conduct original research, publish books and articles, and teach courses on specific eras, regions, or themes. While the academic job market is competitive, those who succeed enjoy intellectual freedom and the opportunity to shape the next generation of scholars.

Secondary School History Teacher

Teaching history at the middle or high school level is a stable and rewarding career for those who love working with young people. Many states require a teaching certification, but a bachelor’s degree in history is a common starting point. History teachers not only convey facts but help students develop critical thinking skills that last a lifetime — a direct application of the analytical training gained during university.

Archivist

Archivists are the gatekeepers of historical records. They appraise, collect, organize, preserve, and provide access to materials of enduring value. This includes everything from centuries-old manuscripts to digital records. Archivists work in museums, universities, government agencies, corporations, and special libraries. The role requires a strong understanding of historical context and meticulous organizational skills.

Museum Curator

Curators manage collections of artifacts, artworks, and historical objects. They research the provenance and significance of items, design exhibits, write interpretive texts, and often oversee educational programs. A master’s degree in museum studies or a related field is common, but a history background provides the essential foundation for understanding how objects fit into larger narratives.

Historical Researcher

Some organizations hire historians specifically to conduct research for publications, documentaries, or legal cases. Historical researchers delve into archives, libraries, and digital databases to uncover facts, verify timelines, and construct accurate accounts of events. This role can be freelance or in-house at think tanks, historical societies, or media companies.

Government and Public Service Roles

Governments at all levels employ historians and history-trained professionals in a wide variety of capacities. The federal government, for instance, hires historians for agencies such as the National Park Service, the State Department, and the Department of Defense. Understanding the list of careers in history within the public sector reveals many opportunities that combine research with civic duty.

Public Historian

Public history is a field that brings historical knowledge to broad audiences outside of academia. Public historians work in historic sites, museums, cultural resource management firms, and government agencies. They develop exhibits, lead tours, create oral history projects, and advise on historic preservation. The goal is to make history accessible and relevant to everyday people.

Historic Preservation Specialist

Preservationists work to protect and restore buildings, landscapes, and other structures of historical significance. They may assess properties for landmark status, advise on restoration techniques, or draft preservation plans. This career often intersects with urban planning, architecture, and law.

Policy Analyst

Many policy analysts have backgrounds in history because the discipline teaches how to analyze complex systems over time. Understanding the historical context of current issues — such as economic inequality, international relations, or environmental policy — provides invaluable insight for crafting effective solutions.

Foreign Service Officer or Diplomat

The U.S. Foreign Service and similar agencies in other countries regularly hire liberal arts graduates, including history majors. Diplomats represent their nation abroad, analyze political and economic trends, and negotiate agreements. A deep understanding of a region’s history is critical for interpreting current events and building relationships.

Legal and Business Careers for History Graduates

History majors are well-represented in law schools and corporate offices. The ability to construct a compelling narrative, which is central to both practicing law and business strategy, is honed through historical training. Below are some of the most common career options for history majors in the private sector.

Lawyer

Law school admissions committees value history majors because the curriculum teaches reading comprehension, logical reasoning, and persuasive writing — all essential skills for attorneys. Many history graduates go on to specialize in fields such as constitutional law, international law, or environmental law, where historical knowledge is particularly relevant.

Paralegal

For those interested in legal work without pursuing a law degree, becoming a paralegal is an excellent option. Paralegals assist lawyers by conducting research, organizing case files, and preparing legal documents. A history background provides the research skills and attention to detail needed to succeed.

Management Consultant

Consulting firms hire history graduates for their analytical abilities and their comfort with ambiguity. Consultants solve complex business problems by gathering data, identifying patterns, and proposing strategic changes. The historical skill of interpreting evidence within context translates directly to understanding client industries and markets.

Corporate Historian

Some large corporations employ historians to research and document their own institutional history. This role may involve writing company histories, maintaining archives, celebrating anniversaries, and advising on brand heritage. It is a niche but growing field that values the traditional historian’s toolkit.

Market Research Analyst

Understanding trends over time is key to market research. Analysts study consumer behavior, sales data, and demographic shifts to help companies make informed decisions. History majors are adept at interpreting long-term patterns and presenting their findings clearly.

Media, Writing, and Creative Industries

The narrative skills of historians make them natural fits for storytelling careers. Whether writing books, producing documentaries, or crafting digital content, history graduates bring depth and authenticity to their work. The list of careers in history within the creative sector is extensive and growing.

Journalist or Editor

Journalists with a history background can cover topics with a deeper perspective. They are able to contextualize current events, investigate long-running stories, and produce features that resonate. Editors also benefit from a historian’s attention to accuracy and detail.

Documentary Filmmaker

Producing historical documentaries requires thorough research, narrative construction, and the ability to translate scholarly material into engaging visual stories. Many filmmakers hold history degrees or collaborate closely with historians.

Author or Historian-Writer

Writing history books for a popular audience is a respected career path. Authors like David McCullough and Doris Kearns Goodwin have shown that a passion for the past can lead to bestsellers. This path combines research with literary skill.

Podcaster or Content Creator

The rise of historical podcasts (such as Hardcore History and Revolutions) has opened new avenues for history graduates. Creating a podcast requires strong storytelling, voice performance, and research, all of which align with a historian’s training. Similarly, YouTube channels, blogs, and social media accounts dedicated to history are popular and can generate income.

Non-Profit and Cultural Organization Careers

Many history graduates are drawn to mission-driven work. Non-profit organizations that focus on education, cultural preservation, human rights, and community development often hire history-trained professionals. These roles combine a passion for the past with a desire to make a positive impact.

Grant Writer or Development Officer

Non-profits rely on grant funding to operate. Grant writers must research funders, articulate the organization’s goals, and present compelling cases for support. The persuasive writing skills learned in history courses are directly applicable.

Museum Educator

Unlike curators who focus on collections, museum educators design and lead programs for school groups, families, and adult learners. They interpret historical content for diverse audiences and often develop hands-on activities. An engaging communication style is essential.

Archival Assistant or Library Specialist

Libraries and special collections hire assistants to help patrons access materials, digitize records, and maintain catalogues. Many positions require only a bachelor’s degree in history, making them a great entry point into the archival field.

Oral Historian

Oral historians conduct interviews with individuals to preserve firsthand accounts of historical events. This work is often done within community projects, museums, or research institutions. It demands strong interpersonal skills and deep empathy.

Emerging and Niche Careers

As technology evolves, so do opportunities for history graduates. The list of careers in history now includes roles that did not exist a generation ago. Understanding digital tools and data analysis can open doors to innovative positions.

Digital Humanities Specialist

Digital humanities is an interdisciplinary field that uses computational methods to answer historical questions. Professionals in this area may build digital archives, create interactive maps, or analyze large text corpora. Skills in programming, data visualization, and project management are often required, but a historical perspective is central.

Historical Consultant for Film and Television

Period pieces and historical dramas require accuracy in costumes, sets, dialogue, and plot. Historical consultants advise production teams to ensure authenticity. This is a freelance role that allows historians to work on exciting creative projects.

Genealogist

Genealogists trace family histories for individuals or organizations. This career has grown with the popularity of DNA testing and online records. Genealogists work for private clients, law firms (for estate cases), or genealogical societies.

Museum Exhibit Designer

While curators provide content, exhibit designers shape the physical experience. They create layouts, interactive displays, and lighting to tell a story. A background in history is helpful for understanding the narrative, though design skills are also essential.

Combining a Passion for History with Other Fields

One of the most important takeaways from a review of the list of careers in history is that the degree is rarely a limiting factor. Many professionals successfully combine their historical training with another discipline. For example, a history major who later earns a Master of Business Administration (MBA) can become a heritage tourism manager. A history major who studies library science can become a digital archivist. A history major who learns geographic information systems (GIS) can work in historical mapping. The possibilities are limited only by one’s willingness to adapt and continue learning.

Conclusion

The study of history is far more than a backward glance; it is a rigorous preparation for a wide array of professional endeavors. As this extensive list of careers in history demonstrates, graduates can thrive in academia, government, law, business, media, non-profit work, and beyond. The key lies in recognizing and articulating the value of the skills acquired — critical thinking, research, communication, and contextual analysis. Employers across nearly every
