For over seven decades, Dame Maggie Smith has graced the screen with a presence that is at once sharp, vulnerable, and utterly captivating. To explore the vast landscape of Maggie Smith movies and TV shows is to trace the arc of modern British acting itself. From the hallowed stages of the National Theatre to the fantastical corridors of Hogwarts and the opulent drawing rooms of Downton Abbey, her career is a testament to remarkable range. She has portrayed queens, professors, dowagers, and spinsters, each time delivering a performance that feels both monumental and deeply human. Whether delivering a devastating one-liner or a moment of profound silence, Smith commands attention. This article delves into the finest works of her extensive filmography, exploring the roles that defined her legacy and continue to endear her to new generations of fans.

Early Career and Breakthrough Roles on Screen

While Maggie Smith was already a celebrated stage actress, her transition to film in the 1960s marked the beginning of a legendary screen career. Her early work established her as a performer of remarkable emotional depth and technical precision.

The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie (1969)

It is impossible to discuss Maggie Smith movies and TV shows without starting with the role that won her the Academy Award for Best Actress. In The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, Smith plays a charismatic and unconventional Edinburgh schoolteacher in the 1930s. She is magnetic, manipulative, and ultimately tragic. Smith's performance is a masterclass in nuance; she makes Brodie both a figure of ridicule and a source of genuine pathos. The film remains a cornerstone of her filmography and a benchmark for character-driven cinema.

Travels with My Aunt (1972) and California Suite (1978)

Smith demonstrated her comedic agility in Travels with My Aunt, playing the eccentric Aunt Augusta. However, it was her role in the Neil Simon comedy California Suite that earned her a second Academy Award, this time for Best Supporting Actress. In the film, she portrays a British actress nominated for an Oscar who must navigate a chaotic hotel room full of neuroses. Her timing, physical comedy, and impeccable delivery of witty dialogue are on full display, proving her ability to dominate a scene without ever raising her voice.

The Defining Era of British Cinema and Television

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, Smith became a staple of prestigious British productions, often working with the Merchant Ivory production company and appearing in adaptations of classic literature.

A Room with a View (1985)

Directed by James Ivory, this adaptation of E.M. Forster's novel features Smith as Charlotte Bartlett, a prim and anxious chaperone. Her performance provides both comic relief and emotional grounding. Charlotte's moral dilemmas and quiet repression are played with such subtlety that the character becomes far more than just a fussy spinster. This film is a delightful entry in any list of Maggie Smith movies and TV shows for its gentle humor and beautiful ensemble cast.

The Secret Garden (1993)

Smith took on the role of the stern but ultimately kind-hearted Mrs. Medlock in this beloved adaptation of Frances Hodgson Burnett's classic. While the film focuses on the young protagonist, Smith's presence anchors the narrative. She brings a steely authority that slowly melts, reflecting the transformation occurring within the garden itself.

Sister Act (1992) and Sister Act 2 (1993)

Perhaps unexpectedly, Smith joined the cast of this popular comedy franchise as Mother Superior. Her deadpan reaction to Whoopi Goldberg's Deloris Van Cartier is a highlight of both films. The juxtaposition of her refined, theatrical style against the gospel and soul music created some of the most memorable scenes in 90s comedy. It is a testament to her versatility that she could steal scenes in a musical comedy set in a convent.

The Global Phenomenon: Harry Potter

For a generation of younger viewers, the gateway to Maggie Smith movies and TV shows came in the form of a pointed hat and a stern frown. Her portrayal of Professor Minerva McGonagall in the Harry Potter series (2001–2011) introduced her to a global audience of millions.

Smith brought a formidable intelligence and dry wit to the Deputy Headmistress of Hogwarts. McGonagall is a disciplinarian, but she is also fiercely protective of her students. Smith masterfully balanced the character's strictness with moments of deep, unspoken affection. Whether teaching Transfiguration, leading the Gryffindor Quidditch team, or dueling with Severus Snape, she made McGonagall an icon of strength and integrity. Notably, Smith continued the role while undergoing treatment for breast cancer, demonstrating the same bravery and dedication as her character. Her performance in the final battle scenes of Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows – Part 2 is genuinely moving, cementing her place in cinematic history.

Television Triumphs: Downton Abbey and Beyond

While film brought her fame, television provided Smith with some of her most celebrated and award-winning roles.

Downton Abbey (2010–2015)

As Violet Crawley, the Dowager Countess of Grantham, Smith became a pop culture phenomenon. Her character was the repository of the show's most savage and quotable lines. With a practiced flick of her wrist or a raised eyebrow, she could convey centuries of aristocratic condescension. Yet, Smith also imbued Violet with a surprising warmth and wisdom. Her relationships with her grandson, Matthew Crawley, and her alter ego, Isobel Crawley, provided the emotional core of the series.

- Awards: Smith won three Primetime Emmy Awards for her role in the series, along with multiple Golden Globe nominations.

- Cultural Impact: The character became a symbol of witty, unapologetic age, inspiring countless memes and Halloween costumes.

- Sequels: She reprised the role in the feature films Downton Abbey (2019) and Downton Abbey: A New Era (2022), providing a perfect, almost poetic conclusion to the character's journey.

Other Notable Television Appearances

Smith's television work extends far beyond Downton. She starred in the BBC adaptation of The War That Saved My Life and delivered a wrenching performance in the HBO film My House in Umbria, for which she won an Emmy. Her work in the 1999 television film All the King's Men showcased her ability to handle historical drama with gravitas. When analyzing Maggie Smith movies and TV shows, one must note that her television roles often allowed for even more nuanced character development than her film work.

Later Career Highlights and Recent Films

Far from slowing down, Smith has continued to choose interesting and varied projects well into her eighties. Her recent work demonstrates a willingness to embrace both humor and pathos.

The Best Exotic Marigold Hotel (2011) and The Second Best Exotic Marigold Hotel (2015)

In these heartwarming ensemble comedies, Smith plays Muriel Donnelly, a grumpy, prejudiced woman who moves to India for a cheaper hip replacement. Her character arc is one of the most satisfying in the films, transforming from a closed-minded bigot into a compassionate and effective manager of the hotel. Smith's comedic timing remains razor-sharp, and she holds her own against a cast of legends including Judi Dench and Bill Nighy.

The Lady in the Van (2015)

This is arguably one of the most challenging roles of Smith's later career. She plays the real-life Miss Mary Shepherd, a cantankerous woman who lived in a van on playwright Alan Bennett's driveway for 15 years. Smith transformed physically and vocally for the role, disappearing into the character's eccentricities and stubbornness. The film is a poignant study of friendship, class, and the dignity of a difficult life. It earned Smith a BAFTA nomination for Best Actress and is a must-see for any serious fan of her work.

Sparkling Short Films and Cameos

Smith also appeared in smaller, independent films such as Quartet (2012) and The Girl Who Leapt Through Time (the English dub). She even took on a role in the sci-fi drama Sherlock (though uncredited). Each role, no matter how small, is treated with the same meticulous care and depth.
